Windy Day Walleye
 Besides diffusing light rays, windy weather also stirs up sediment, plankton, aquatic organisms and baitfish in weeds or flats. Walleye that were buried now move up the water column to feed. Long drifts over these areas with spinner rigs can be productive.

A Quick and Safe Release
 Reel in the fish as quickly as possible. If possible keep the fish in water during hook removal. Use needle nose pliers. Never tear out the hook. Avoid contact with fish eye sockets and gills. Don't let the fish flop around. Its scales and body slime are needed to protect it from disease. If the hook is embedded too deeply, cut the line as close as possible to the hook and leave it in. To revive a fish hold it upright gently by the tail. Move it side to side slowly. Release it when it can swim away under its own steam.

Winter Pike Locations: At the start of the fishing season start your search around remaining weeds in shallow areas. A bay with an inflowing creek should top your list. Fish in 5' to 10' of water. By mid season consider deeper water adjacent to main lake points, rock piles or shoals. Just before ice out, try the deeper holes near shallow bays where the spawn will be taking place in the immediate future.

Three Mile Lake

Shoreline Cruising Smallies
 Smallmouth bass will often cruise along shorelines looking for a meal even on the sunniest of days. They will use inside weed lines (if there are any) as a highway or be on patrol right out in the open. Be very quiet. Wear your fishing sunglasses and try to position yourself so that you don't cast shadows in front of you.

Late Afternoon Winter Walleye: Walleye will often go on a food patrol late in the afternoon just before the sun sets. If you've got a favourite weed flat that breaks into deeper water, drill a series of holes at various depths before the feeding frenzy begins. Work each hole for 5 to 10 minutes before moving on to the next one.
